

SAMUEL L. BLUMENFELD

161 Great Road

Littleton, MA 01460

781-354-2040

slblu123@verizon.net

February 28, 2011

Jeffrey S. Glassman, Esq.
Jeffrey S. Glassman, LLC
One Beacon Street
Boston, MA

Dear Mr. Glassman:

I understand that you handle cases dealing with brain injuries and medical malpractice. Do you handle cases involving educational malpractice and brain deformities resulting from such practice? School-induced dyslexia is a problem plaguing millions of children, but no one has been able to hold the schools responsible for the damage they do to the children.

As a writer, lecturer and educator I have been dealing with these problems for many years and wonder why the legal profession has not stepped in to help individuals gain compensation from the those who have caused the problem. Individuals with school-induced dyslexia have their earning power reduced, are reading disabled, and must suffer humiliation in the workplace for the rest of their lives. Yet no one is held accountable for causing these life-altering damages.

I consider educational malpractice to be as serious a problem as medical malpractice, and I wonder if you would be willing to look into this problem. If so, I would be more than happy to provide you with a good deal of information on the subject. We have proof that school-induced dyslexia exists and is harming thousands of children every day.

Brain scans show that school-induced dyslexia deforms the brain, thus making it impossible for the child to advance academically. Private remedial tutoring can be very expensive, and special private schools dealing with dyslexia charge thousands of dollars in tuition.

I strongly believe that this is a problem the legal profession should concern itself. I hope you agree with me.

Sincerely yours,